

SETTLING OR NOT SETTLING?

By Amity Word

It's tough being in your late 30s and single. Trust me, I know.

I was engaged 10 years ago when I was 27 yrs. old.

I thank God that it didn't work out and that God intervened and let me know that he was not the one for me.

I could have made a huge mistake. There are so many guys that I considered dating that I thought could be potential husband material but something in my spirit just kept telling me to wait and take my time and watch and observe and b4 I knew it, their true colors showed.

Not that they were bad guys, they were good and decent...but just not the one for me.

Regardless, of how much you want to be loved and understood and cared for and held...don't settle. Anytime your mind is wavering on a guy, or you go back and forth with "well he's good at this, but I absolutely can't stand this.." about him; when in doubt don't do it.

Don't get involved in him because it could lead to disaster, heart ache, stress, and energy wasting. I believe sometimes I want something so bad that even if the guy is not right for me, I always see the good in him.

But when we TRY, key word is "try" to keep seeing the good in spite of all the things you know that you absolutely cannot put up with; then you are settling. I know, sometimes it's hard to tell if you are settling or not because we want to be in love soooo badly.

If the guy doesn't bring you peace or you can't completely be yourself around him, or you feel you can't talk to him about everything, or he doesn't make you feel beautiful or good about yourself, or he just doesn't get you or understand you

...then guess what?

He's definitely NOT the one.

If you feel you have to try to make a connection happen between you, then guess what? He's not the one.

When he's the one, a connection would be effortless and love will come when you least expect it. Remember, love will choose you.

You don't have to try to go out and conquer love. Love will grab you without notice when it's the right time. So HOLD ON SISTERS.

Don't rush into relationships or hurry to be sexually intimate too soon.

Take your time! WAIT, WAIT, WAIT.

Why? Because you are worth it!

And the one you're waiting for will think so too.